For millions, the art of Frederic Remington is synonymous with the American West. Indeed, the view you have in your mind's eye of the late 19th century Western Frontier is, almost certainly, founded in Remington's works. As President Theodore Roosevelt observed about his friend, "The soldier, the cowboy and rancher, the Indian, the horses and cattle of the plains, will live in his pictures and bronzes, I verily believe, for all time."

Remington's remarkable chronicle of the Western frontier was based on time he spent in the West observing the end of the era we know as the Old West. "I knew the railroad was coming, I saw men already swimming into the land... I knew the wild rider and the vacant land were about to vanish forever - and the more I considered the subject the bigger the forever loomed... Without knowing exactly how to do it, I began to try to record some facts around me, and the more I looked the more the panorama unfolded."

With his fascination of military life and the freedom and excitement of the Old West, Remington used his artistic talents to capture the thrill and grandeur of a changing era. Starting with simple sketches for the major periodicals of the day, his works and subject matter were embraced by an eager public seeking realistic renditions of this "Wild West" they read about. From these original illustrations, Remington evolved into one of the best-known American artists ever, and today his paintings and sculptures are on display in some of the most illustrious museums in America.

Now, you can relive the Old West as never before with the "Frederic Remington Art Museum Tribute Rifle" from America Remembers. Issued in cooperation with the Frederic Remington Art Museum in Ogdensburg, New York, this handsome Tribute captures Remington's favorite subjects with the cavalry prominently displayed on the left side and images of the Western frontier featured on the right side. Craftsmen commissioned specifically for this issue by America Remembers decorate each rifle with handsome artwork in 24-karat gold with a special blackened silver-nitride background for maximum detail.
